The human rights frame cannot suggest directly contrary actions. No way to adjudicate among competing human rights claims will help policymakers figure out what to do when two human rights claims directly compete with one another. What the human right perspective does not do is provide a mechanism by which policymakers can determine how to weigh and balance these competing claims and come up with a set of public health principles such as fairness, accountability and transparency. While our viewpoint certainly isn't the only public health perspective, what we tried to provide was a mechanism to help policymakers figure out what to do when two human rights claims directly compete with one another. What the human rights perspective does not do is provide a mechanism by which policymakers can determine how to weigh and balance these competing claims and come up with a set of public health principles such as fairness, accountability and transparency. While our viewpoint certainly isn't the only public health perspective, what we tried to provide was a mechanism to help policymakers figure out what to do when two human rights claims directly compete with one another.